DESCRIPTION:

This is a row of three two-story brick houses built about 1880 on the south side of Mura Street between North Chester and Chatham Streets in northeast central Baltimore, Maryland. The principal elevations face north and have two bays, all openings of which are boarded. The window and door openings are arched segmentally with wood infill frames. The sills are also wood. The cornice line breaks between 2029 and 2031 as the grade rises to the east. The cornices are identical, with projecting coronas and perforated soffits above fascia panels held by simple brackets. The cornices are in varying degrees of deterioration, from fair to good and the perforated design at 2031 has been replaced by a plain soffit panel. The group of houses formerly was in the middle of a row, but demolition of the western end has left 2027 as the end of the present row. The adjoining rowhouses to the east are currently occupied.

SIGNIFICANCE:

AREA: Architecture

LEVEL: Local

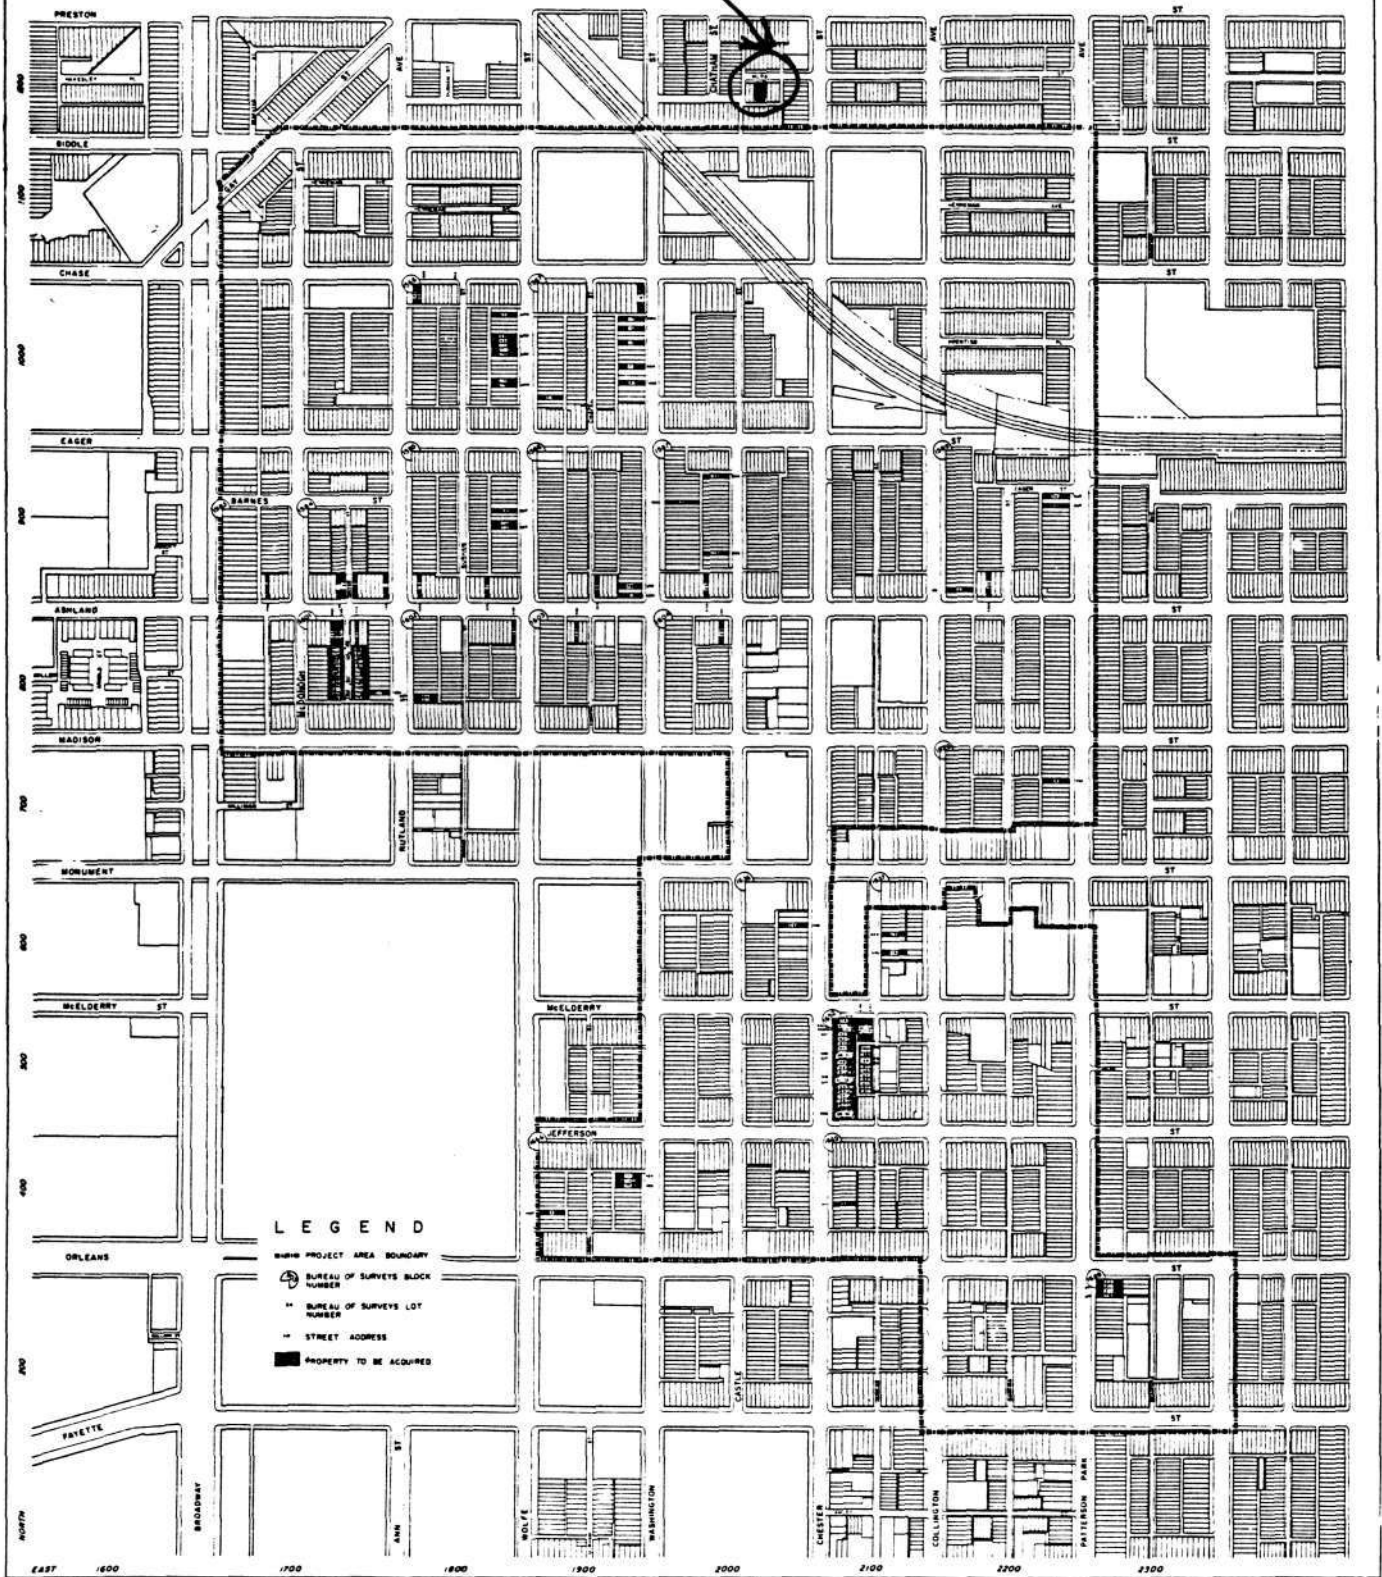

The group of three adjoining rowhouses at 2027-2029-2031 Mura Street are contributing buildings in an undefined historic district of late 19th and early 20th century rowhouses located in the area of Gay Street and the Baltimore Cemetery. The district was largely built and populated by immigrant German middle class workers. The houses on Mura Street are exemplary of the standard working class residence of the last quarter of the 19th century.
